A novel about a mixed-blood Korean War orphan who names himself Moo Moo, literally "Nothing Nothing." Convinced that he is the unwanted byproduct of a hungry Korean whore and a sex-starved American soldier, he discovers instead that his ancestry binds him closely to the history of modern Korea, her loss of independence to Japan, liberation, division, war and dispersion. Amidst despair and sorrow over the tragedies that have devastated his entire family, and anger and contempt for the inane fratricidal hostility still continuing between north and south, Moo Moo rejects identification with either side and chooses to live in the US, making films dedicated to the validation of many lives wasted and lost, "the fate of a displaced people wandering the globe in search of home and sustenance."
